The James Delingpole Channel – Josh – Feb 12, 2021 — Transcript

Posted on April 20, 2021 by admin

[James Delingpole talks with Josh (aka "Richard the Lionheart"), about his background in the military, his music, the dire effects of diversity, and his planned Covid protest march from the south coast of England (from where he can see the Isle of Wight) all the way up to Hadrian's Wall. (Which he has since completed.)

Delingpole: Okay. Welcome to the Delingpod with me, James Delingpole. And I know I always say I'm excited about this week's special guest. But I really am! I spotted this man on Twitter. And so did lots of you. Lots of you said to me:

> "Oh my god! You've got to get this man on your podcast now!"

And normally I'm really slow about these things. But today I've got my act together. And I've got hold of Josh. Josh, welcome! Welcome to the Delingpod! Just what's your Twitter handle? Where did you put out this brilliant video you made?

Josh: I actually didn't put it up on Twitter. My Twitter account has been pretty inactive, I'd say, for a while. I used to be a musician and stuff, and I had the Twitter from years, and years back. But then I basically released a video through Telegram.

Delingpole: Oh yeah.

Josh: And I was using the Telegram App. And I think somebody just got hold of it and shared it throughout Twitter. I kind of lost faith in Twitter a few years ago. It just seems to be this kind of delusional biosphere of radical lefties that just don't seem to come to terms with the reality of the world, you know. [chuckling] So I just, I don't engage too often. But every now and again I've just poked my nose in, you know.

Delingpole: It's quite interesting, because like one of the things I like about having you on the podcast is that you are, to all intents and purposes, a "civilian", you know. Normally I get my guests from this coterie of vaguely prominent skeptics and dissidents of one kind, or another.

But you're here representing real Britain! I think there are lots of people like you out there who are mightily pissed off with what's happened to their country! And we'll come to that at the moment. But even what you said about Twitter, so many people are going to be going:

> "Yeah! Exactly!"

Because like you I tend to prefer Telegram now. I like the fact that it was invented by the Ruskis! It's something I find that reassuring somehow [chuckling]. They seem to be less tainted than this whole corrupt, … Isn't it bizarre that the Russians are now kind of almost less tainted than the whole corrupt Western, all the Western institutions have been have been compromised in some way.

And yeah, Telegram is good. Twitter I use it out of habit, really. It's just I've got something. Like I don't know, nearly 50,000. I mean, less now followers from there. And it's kind of quite a useful vestigial communication tool. But yeah, I think we need to migrate elsewhere.

Anyway, so you put up this video on Telegram. And you must tell me about yourself! You say you were a musician. What? A kind of a rock musician?

Josh: No. I mean, I've had quite, you know, a few roles in society. I left school straight out of secondary school and ended up joining the military. I was in the military for about six years. And then after that I got a job naturally working in a gym doing circuit training and things like that.

Delingpole: Yeah.

Josh: And I'd always wanted to play an instrument. And at the time I was living in a place called Gosport* on the south coast. I don't know if, you know, it?

> [Gosport is a town in Hampshire on the south coast of the United Kingdom. At the 2011 Census, it's population was 91, 544. It is situated on a peninsula on the Western side of Portsmouth Harbour, opposite the city of Portsmouth, to which it is linked by the Gosport Ferry. Source: Wikipedia].

Delingpole: Yeah.

Josh: But yeah, for lack of a better term it was a shit-hole! And I wanted to play the drums, because I played the drums when I was younger. And so my neighbors came around and said:

> "If you play that drum kit anymore. I'm going to stab you!"

So basically I had to come up with something else. So I got a guitar — and you could play guitar with headphones on — and I started playing music and writing songs. And somebody said to me:

> "I'll give you 150 quid if you come and play at my pub on Friday night."

And I was like:

> "150 quid? Yes please!"

And I thought:

> "Well if I could get three, or four of these then that would be great!"

And it just went from there really. And it kind of skyrocketed! I ended up getting signed. I have still now, publishing deals on various songs. One of my songs recently, an EDM track, got six million [!], … What do you call them? Listens, I suppose, on Spotify. Which is really quite an interesting thing. Because I wrote that song, because I don't really like electronic dance music. I sort of wrote it as a sort of cliche. Like, this is how to write a crappy five-minute song. But we would call it a "hook line". And end up coming this really popular sort of summer dance hit on Spotify, and there you go.

But anyway, yeah, so I was kind of doing the music for a bit. And then I started going over to France and playing my music in the French Alps. So I was snowboarding every day. I towed a caravan with me. And I had a little, well a little dog, I had a big dog called "Rudy". And he came with me and we just slept in the caravan, snowboarded every day, and then played music in bars. And I just started chatting to people and getting lots of contacts, meeting great people. And I did that for about five, or so, years.

And then in the summers I was kind of using the money that I earned from doing that, to learn new skills. And I eventually just got myself into welding and fabricating, because I've always enjoyed making things with my hands. And I come from a long line of farriers actually, believe it, or not.

Delingpole: Really!

Josh: Yeah. And I always wanted to work with metal. And so I always wanted to work with metal. And so, yeah, I got into welding and fabrication. Walked into a workshop and basically said qu to the guy:

> "I'm not after your money, or a job. I just want to learn this trade. And here's some of my welding I've done so far."

And he said:

> "Well there's a pile of scrap in the corner there. If you can produce a weld that I can sell, I'll give you a job."

And that's how it went basically.

And I was working for him for quite a while. Then eventually the first lockdown happened and the work started to dry up. Because we were building parts for super yachts. I mainly worked with stainless steel as a TIG welder. And some of the contractors for super yachts they were working for had to shut down their factories, because people were testing positive. And they had like an A Team, and a B Team. If someone tested positive, … And basically it was just affecting this production line of the things that we were making. And, because I was the last one in the door I was sort of the first one out.

And so I had to go on this job hunt again. And then I found a new firm and I was doing all this site work on building sites. And that really opened my eyes, because I was going around to these houses. And they were just decimating woodland and just building just thousands of thousands of really poor matchbox houses everywhere! And I thought:

> "Bloody hell! I'm contributing to this at the moment!"

And this is scaring me, because who are these houses for? Like what is this all for? I don't like the quality. And I was on the building sites as well. And the large majority of people that work on building sites aren't actually English! And what I was doing was building staircases. So more often than not we'd have to remove the temporary staircase that was there, and you'd put signs up saying:

> "Don't come down the staircase!"

But a lot of these people can't even read the sign! So that's when I kind of started to get into this place where I thought I could start speaking out about this sort of thing, because it's got to be an element of health and safety and whatnot.

And yeah, I started my channel. I basically just used my YouTube channel that I'd had from the music before. I just started speaking about my own personal experiences. And I always said to myself:

> "Look, I never want to advocate for, you know, any violence, or anything like that. But I just don't want to live in this country were you can't speak your mind. I just want to be able to speak my mind! And also stand up for my own people. I'm English! That's my ethnicity! This is England. And I'm going to speak about that."

So I'm not an aristocrat, or an intellectual, or anything. I'm just a welder. And I can only speak from that perspective.

Delingpole: Wow! There's so much there to talk about! I mean, starting with your time in the Alps, living the dream! Snowboarding, and making music! I mean, how many of us, … That belongs to an age that we've almost lost, doesn't it? That really, and until last year, this would have been the dream of every young man! I'm gonna grow my hair long and just spend some time out, boarding, … And oh god!

But you couldn't do that now! I mean, you couldn't even get on the airplane! Or not without going through this rigourous quarantine procedure.

And then can I just ask you briefly about "farrier"? Is it farriers who do put shoes on horses, or is that blacksmiths? So I always forget that.

Josh: The farriers works with horses specifically.

Delingpole: Yeah! You see I love that because, you know, I'm really into horses!

Josh: Yeah that's great!

Delingpole: But the smell! The horrible smell of burnt hoof, when the horses are having their shoes replaced! Can you do horseshoes? Or is that not in your skill set?

Josh: I've never done it. But I imagine I probably could. It's something I'd love to try! If there's any blacksmiths listening in who want to give me a shot, I'd love to come and have a go and kind of rekindle that that part of my lineage.

Delingpole: I bet you'd be good! And also it might become necessary, because this new agrarian age that's going to be imposed on us by the Great Reset, and stuff. Probably cars will be banned, and we'll only have horses! Which actually, I wouldn't mind that particular detail. So you could be in demand!

Josh: It's funny, because, … I was going to say my great grandfather came to London specifically to put horses down, to cull the horses, because of the introduction of the automobile. So there was all these horses around. Nobody wanted to keep them. They didn't have a purpose anymore. And my dad tells me stories about — who's [grandfather] a little boy — sitting up on his car taking horses to the slaughter, you know, as a five-year-old boy, or whatever in East London.

Delingpole: There's a bit of forgotten history! I mean, I knew that that in the run-up to the sort of development of the automobile, there was this great concern I think towards the end of the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th century, there was a great concern in metropolis across the world, of how they were going to cope with the massive increase in the amount of horseshit in the streets! Because it was a real issue at the time. And I think there were discussions about what government intervention can be adopted to deal with this problem.

But, of course, technology solved the issue the car came in instead. But the sad consequence of that was horses.

You look, by the way, like you could be, I'm sorry. I'm going to insult you here! You could be in Mumford and Sons almost [chuckling] which should be kind of appropriate to that kind of musician, sort of piky, rustic, horse [chuckling] thing going on! Anyway!

Josh: Yeah. I was gonna say, I definitely like the outdoor, as I've got older I now own a wax Chiles [sp]. I mean, you just cannot beat these clothes. And before the lockdown I would go into charity shops. And what's great about them is old people really know how to dress practically. So if you want practical clothing, those are the places to go. And always pick up Chiles, nice jackets, hats, things like that. And as an Englishman, it's our bread and butter isn't it?

Delingpole: I've totally gone that way as well! Actually, I was just a brief foray into sartorial corner. I've now realized that the only kind of shirt, … I used to wear these kind of floral Paul Smith shirts and they look poncy!

Yeah, particularly middle-aged men [chuckling]! They're lovely to look at! They're lovely on the rack. But when you put them on you just look like a middle-aged ponce in a floral shirt! What a man needs beyond a certain age actually and probably you can start a new trend, …

My son looks brilliant in them! Much better than me. It's this kind of pocket, it's called "Pocket check". It's like a smaller version of Tattersall check. And it's just like goes with everything! And I'm wearing this Bernard Weatherall kind of shooting, you know, sage-colored shooting top. I'm really happy in country wear. It's just the best! I think it's proper for an Englishman.

Josh: Absolutely! I think it's a gentleman's prerogative absolutely to look a bit sharp all the time! Or as my dad would you say:

> "You know what son? There's nothing wrong with looking a bit [snapping fingers]!"

And he would click his fingers.

Delingpole: Your dad's absolutely right! So tell me. "Gosport". That suggests to me that you might be have been in the one of the naval branches of the services. Were you a Marine? Or in the navy, or not?

Josh: Yes. I started off in the Royal Navy. I wanted to be in the Marines all the time. And I went into the careers office. And I can remember having this conversation, because I was supposed to stay behind after school in order to go to college. And I was so anti-school at the time! Like:

> "I'm not staying behind after school!"

And I remember coming home. And my parents were like.:

> "Well, what are you going to do then, if you're not going to college?"

And I said:

> "Ah I'll just, I guess I'll just join the army, or something."

And they were like:

> "Josh you don't have the discipline for that! You can't do that. You don't realize what you're doing!"

And I went into the careers office. I said:

> "Right. What is the hardest one to get into!"

And they said:

> "Well the Royal Marines Commando courses. The longest, hardest training in the world."

So I was like:

> "Right! Sign me up!"

But at the time I was boxing. I've always been a boxer, I love mixed martial arts and things like that. And I was weighing in, when I was 15, at literally, I think I was about 50 kilos. Which is nothing! And you have to be 64 kilos to join the Royal Marines, because of the training. So they said:

> "What you can do is join the Navy. Get a bit of military bearing, and when you're a bit older and heavier, then branch transfer across. Because the Marines are a branch within the Navy."

And that's what I ended up doing.

So I did a few years in the Royal Navy, sail around the world. I was on HMS York for a while. Did some Opt tours and got promoted. And then I got recommended for branch transfer to the Marines, and went off and did that. So all in all my service was about six years. And for me it was one of those things I really loved it! I didn't regret it.

But I found it very difficult to sort of plan my life. You have to be in there 100%, or nothing. And it was a very difficult transition to come from the military, back into civvy street. And I think that's why a lot of those guys end up homeless. And I've certainly been in some pretty dire situations in my life before, as well. Just purely, because it is such a difficult transition for people to make. But yeah, sorry.

Delingpole: How did you find the commando training? I mean, to get your green beret?

Josh: Well, it's the hardest thing to do. It's very, very difficult! It's like I said, the longest, hardest training in the world. But I think it just gets to a point, after a while, where you there's only one person that could kind of kick you off that course, or fail that course. And that's yourself.

The whole thing is, I suppose, is a battle with your own self. I always do it like when I'm running now. And I think most people could relate to this in your life, where you tend to just have sort of binary thinking process. Where you have two voices in your head. One voice telling you should do something. And one voice telling you shouldn't. And you have to, I suppose, to choose the Right voice to listen to, and keep pushing.

I run all the time. And a lot of my videos are filmed whilst I'm running, because I think it releases all these endorphins. It's very, very good for thinking! It's the same with walking, as well, if you're not into running. Just being outdoors, fresh air, in the woodlands, running by the sea, or whatever it is you've got.

And I just find that what that does is it teaches you to listen to the right voice, and helps you to become more determined as a person. And overall it's just really brilliant for your health. So, that's why my videos are kind of focused around that.

Delingpole: I so totally agree with you about everything there! I do about 20 miles a week. I'm having a relapse of my Lyme disease at the moment. So I've knocked it on the head for a while. But I generally do about 20 miles a week. And walking I think is, … Running is great, endorphins and stuff. I don't wear headphones. Do you? I quite like being left with my own own thoughts, rather than having it.

Josh: It depends. I do sometimes, yes. But sometimes no. I am of the camp that thinking that listening to music whilst running is a bit cheating. And if you're out walking listening with headphones. And it's a dreadful show.

Delingpole: That is wrong!

Josh: Nature provides, … Yeah! Nature provides the soundtrack for your walk and that it's an insult to your very being to suggest otherwise. So yeah, running sometimes I do it if I'm going for a particularly arduous run, then I might have some music playing, or whatever. It's a little bit of a cheat. But I also remind myself, …

Delingpole: Eye of the tiger!

Josh: [chuckling] No. Do, you know what? My music, it's one of those things if you run quite a lot you get bored of the same playlist.

Delingpole: Yeah.

Josh: And I've gone through so much it's quite an eclectic mix of music on my phone now. I actually have like a Mongolian throat singing on there! It's like there's all sorts on there to listen to. Yeah, well it's really good sort of war music. So when you're running it helps you to be quite enthusiastic and keep going. But it helps with the determination of the thing.

Delingpole: Okay. I'll check out this Mongolian throat music next time I'm out for a run. But yeah, walking I agree!

I have the best conversations with people when I walk with them. I mean, if I were ever going to have a sort of business meeting with somebody, I'd want to take them for a five mile walk. And just it clears your head. And you can communicate in a way that you can't sitting around a boardroom table, not that I would know what a boardroom table looks like particularly. But, you know what I mean, it's great yeah.

And you made that video, of course, while you were running, which was great. I don't know how you can get your breathing, right? Like where you can talk and run at the same time. Commando training?

Josh: No. Certainly not! It's been such a long time now, since I've left. It would be unfair of me to credit any of my physical attributes to training that I did such a long time ago.

But it's one of those things. I think if you run enough you get like a base level pace that you can run at. And sometimes I practice just running uphill and holding my breath for as long as I can. It's very good to improve your VO2 Max and make your muscles more efficient at working without having, you know, as much oxygen as they would like. I think training in general is about taking your body outside of its comfort zone. Once you do that obviously it then tries to change to become better. And that's the whole point.

So there's always these little tricks you can do. And so the videos help me vent my frustrations of the world, but also they help me on a physical level by improving my VO2 Max, as well.

Delingpole: So. Before we move on to politics and the shit-show in which we find ourselves. When you were in the Marines did you do any tours of duty abroad?

Josh: I've done Optelic 11 before. I did some like operations like anti-piracy, and bits and bobs like that.

Delingpole: Somalia, like that?

Josh: Yeah. Yes bits and bobs like that. I was in Op Gina as well, which was like an evacuation of British citizens from, I don't know if you remember, Israel and Lebanon, back in 2006.

Delingpole: Oh yeah.

Josh: There's a bit of bits and bobs really. I was very lucky. But, because I was so into boxing I spent a bit of time on the boxing squad, doing that as well. So I don't really know. I was much more into the sport than the kind of military side of it, I have to say.

Delingpole: Yeah.

Josh: And if you are a young person watching, or a person that's always thought about joining the forces, and you play sport, it's really the best place to be. Because it doesn't matter if you join the RAF, or the Navy, Army, whatever it may be and they always have really good programs for people that are interested in sport. And if you're a good rugby player, or football player, or whatever, even skiing, motorcycle, racing, whatever it is you may be they tend to have, you know, quite good programs for that.

I don't know what's it like now. And when I was in Theresa May was the Home Secretary, and kind of got to the point where she was making lots of people redundant. And they were having, there was lots of MOD cutbacks, basically.

Delingpole: Yeah!

Josh: So yeah, I think when I left it was a good time to get out.

Delingpole: I think you're probably right. I mean, everything I've read recently suggests that the Armed Forces have been cut right to the bone! In fact, probably into the bone! You're underpaid, …

Josh: Oh! Don't get me started about it! It's got this advert, I don't know if you've seen it, where there's this guy, this Muslim guy, who stops in the middle of a patrol to pray! And everyone's just kind of like:

> "Right we better stop."

What we're doing? It's like what that doesn't have a, … Like, you're there to be a soldier! When you think about it objectively speaking, it's very strange that a part of the training now, a huge element of that, is this diversity training. And I have to often ask myself:

> "Why? If, This is something that should occur so naturally to people, why are we so heavily being, you know, trained to be more tolerant of each other?"

And "tolerant" is a word that I've grown to detest, as of late! Because it effectively just means:

> "Put up with things that you wouldn't normally put up with."

That's what "tolerance" really means.

Delingpole: Yup.

Josh: And I hate these politicians who sit there with a smirk on their face as they dilute and subvert our English culture, and call it "diversity". And that is a positive thing. And they'd call people like me a "supremacist"! People called me a "supremacist" before! That's simply not the case!

I think it's a very supremacist idea to think that you could defeat a virus! And you could lift the entire globe out of world poverty! And then keep it forever that way! Those are totalitarian, supremacy ideas! Not what I'm saying! I just love my own people. And just, because I love my own people, doesn't necessarily mean then I hate everybody else.

My ideology about peoples is that I think that everybody should have the right to their own homeland. And those people should determine the future of their own homeland.

If I go on holiday to India I would like to see Indian culture. If I go to New Zealand, you know, I want to see the Maori. And I want to see that. And when people come to England on holiday, I'd like then to see English culture. But if you went into London, or Birmingham, Luton, Rotherham, and Bradford, all these places now, it doesn't look to me like England anymore. I think it's a dreadful shame! Because we really are great people.

Delingpole: Yeah, it's funny. I've heard myself saying that over the years. And it really oughtn't to need stating. It ought to be so obvious! What's not to like about countries having their own special identity? I mean, you're right! I love going to India and seeing all that, the temples and the statues, you know, to Ganesh, or whatever, and the Sadduce.

Josh: Yeah, I agree! And what's really frightening is why would you want to destroy that? So when you think about it, "diversity" kills diversity! That's what it does! When you localize it in such a way that multiculturalism has, you're basically forcing lots of different people all on top of one another with opposing ideologies, different ideologies, and basically creating these indoctrination programs, these diversity courses stuff, to try and teach people to get on with each other.

There is such a thing, which have a scientific basis, as "in-group preference". I think people have in-group preference. There's absolutely nothing wrong with that. That doesn't mean we can't live alongside each other as neighbours, you know, and work together. And it doesn't mean that all these groups should be constantly fighting each other.

But I think what's happened is like the United Nations Migration Compact, for example. When you look at that thing, it really does just suggest the fact that of like almost like a mongrelization of Europe!

And we're told regularly that we don't have a culture! That we aren't really a people! And I hear this a lot. And I think especially, because I've chosen the White dragon, which is a flag of our ancestors. And people say:

> "Oh what culture? What ancestors? You're a bunch of mongrels! You're this tribe. You're that tribe! And blah, blah, blah!"

And I just find that bizarre that these, … And most of these people are White English people, by the way, who are saying these things!

Delingpole: Yes! Oh, it's definitely university-educated, White, middle-class, people. Probably got jobs in working for the government in something like environmental consultancy, or sustainability, or diversity, or HR. It's just some kind of department which is some sort of non-job. So they're secure, because the public sector is safe.

And they can mouth all these platitudes that they've picked up at university, probably. And which they think makes them better better people. But I'd say that you're more representative of where most of us actually are, outside the sort of the legacy media echo chamber where these views are banded about, as if they are representative. I don't think they are! I think you are much more, … I mean, tell me about your, … How old are you, by the way?

Josh: I'm 31.

Delingpole: Thirty one, okay. So your circle of friends, … I mean, presumably you've got friends [chuckling]?

Josh: Not anymore! It's interesting you should say that, because I've met lots of new friends since I became sort of politically active, or talking about my political opinions.

Delingpole: Yeah!

Josh: I think a lot of people are scared to do that. And when you do that in a public sphere, especially put your face on there, you attract a certain group of people. People that are quite like:

> "Oh! Yeah, it's really great!"

I mean, I've got a touch of people with people, who've got in touch with me, that are, … It's quite heartbreaking stories. Like, for example, people at university who are like:

> "Yeah, I'm quite proud Englishman. But I wouldn't dare say that in front of my friends at school, because otherwise I'll be ostracized."

You know, during their studies. And this happens at universities. So universities, it was my impression of university was supposed to be a place for thinking, and debating, and discussing ideas. But it seems to me that now, after this long march through the institutions we've created this vacuum, or sorry, this kind of like this echo chamber, sorry. Where if you have the wrong ideas then you're going to be ostracized!

And interestingly, my missus at the moment, she's a nurse. But she's retraining to be a paramedic. It's interesting to go back to university at these current times.

Delingpole: Yeah.

Josh: We could talk a bit more in that in a second. But before she started the course, someone had got in touch with her about something she'd put on Instagram. Which was about migrants coming over in rubber dinghies. And my missus is not really that politically minded, or whatever.

She just thinks that people shouldn't be coming into Britain illegally. But the university called her in for a formal meeting about this post that she'd done — before she'd even started the university course — and gave her an informal warning! Which is now permanently on her on her, …

Delingpole: No!

Josh: Yes! And I just think it is disgusting the way the establishment treats people! And this is the argument that they would use. They would demonize people. I've met doctors that aren't actually allowed to practice anymore, because they've said, or done something on social media, which the establishment doesn't agree with. It's just very slightly outside of the Overton Window, perhaps. And it's now affected them. This is why. We have now this Police State, with the thought police. So before the Coronavirus happened people getting knocks on doors, because they are saying things like:

> "Trans-women aren't women."

On Twitter, you know. And actually being arrested and detained and interviewed, or whatever, for a few hours. Posey Parker is a good example of that. And I just find it's bizarre. And this is why I'm doing this march, because I don't want to live in a Police State anymore! They could create these rules around me, I don't care! It's not going to change! My rules exist in here. And my parents told me when I was a youngster. They said:

> "You can do what you want in life, as long as you're not hurting other people, then be free, and do what you feel is right, and be true to yourself."

And I just look at the data that we have for Coronavirus at the moment, okay. And I look at my reality around me and I've made my own decision about it. And that's why I'm marching, because I want everybody else to have those same feelings and strike out like that.

Delingpole: Yes! Well, let's talk about your march. And let's talk about the "White Dragon". Was the White Dragon the flag of wessex, or where is it from?

Josh: Well basically it's almost a folklorean symbol, because the legend has it there's a red dragon under Wales, and a White dragon living under England. And they had this fight and the White dragon prevailed.

And if you look at the times of King Harold's, for example, before 1066, the Welsh actually went and chopped off the head of their own king and gave it to Harold Godwinson, because they were so impressed by this guy. And that really unified our nation. And I don't think that England would be what it is today had it not been for the Welsh longbowmen. So we needed these huge, powerful, burly men to fire these bows. These longbows are made of ancient yew. A bit of Rudyard Kipling:

> "Yew that is old in churchyard-mould, He breedeth a mighty bow."

And they dug up some of these old longbow archers, and their bone density was like 20% denser than anybody else's at the time. All on one side [of their body]. And I believe that they were able to fire these arrows at a pace of, I think, 16 to 30 arrows a minute! Which even today's best archers can't imitate. They can't do it. These were a special breed of people. And those longbows did us a lot of favors at Agincourt and things like that it's a really interesting part of our history.

But the dragons come into it, the White Dragon was a flag of Harold. And a lot of our flags have derived from that. You see the three lions from Richard the first. Henry III, I believe, had the dragon. And interestingly now in more modern times it's all about Saint George slaying the dragon!

But I actually think the dragon was an important part of our ethnic heritage, and where we come from, and where the English people come from. And that's why I've chosen to fly it. As like I said in my video, it's more of a "distress signal" to other Englishmen that something is awry. And it's time for us to do something.

Delingpole: It totally is awry. And I think you've chosen a great symbol. So tell me about your plan. You're going to walk from John o'Groats to [word unclear] is that right?

Josh: No. I'm going from the south coast of England so from somewhere I can see the Isle of Wight. And then I'm walking up to Hadrian's Wall. I have my own personal reasons for choosing Hadrian's Wall. But I wanted somewhere very, very far north, so I could walk almost the entirety of the country with that symbol. And then wave it when I got there. It's a really long and arduous journey.

And I'm not going to actually announce when and where I'm doing it, or what route. I'm going to take. And I've got some close friends of mine that are busy, as we speak, helping me plan the route and things like that. The trouble is that this, my videos gained so much attention now, that I believe there will be a lot of people out there, including the State, and the police, and stuff, that will try and stop me from doing it. So I kind of, …

Delingpole: Yeah. But at the same time what about if we want to join you? I mean, surely a lot of us are going to be wanting to walk legs of the journey with you?

Josh: My worry there is that I would love it! I don't want to do it alone, I'll be honest with you. It'd be nice to have some company. It's a long old way! But my worry would be that if people march with me — it's 350 miles as the crow flies — it's a long, long, march! And there's only a certain group of people that probably would be up to that. And of those people what I would fear is that the police would just turn up, would be easily recognizable, and just start arresting people.

I believe our system works very much like an immune system. So basically every time something rises up in rebellion to that immune system, it creates antibodies, and then stamps that thing out.

So if we create a movement, even if there's two, or three thousand people that want to do this march, the state will respond accordingly. It'd be much easier for one man to dart up his way, up the country, or for singular individuals to make their way to one place from different corners of this nation and all meet and do that. If you move as one body, then you run the risk of being met with another body, which has got more power than we do.

Delingpole: Well it's certainly true that the police are becoming more, and more, we do live in a Police State, as you say. They're becoming more, and more, draconian!

You saw that appalling footage, I'm sure, of police, Greater Manchester police beating up a Polish guy for the crime of opening his cafe. That shocked me! I've seen the, and I've heard of, anti-lockdown rallies being brutalized by the police! In a way that "Black Lives Matter" and Extinction Rebellion never were! Because they were pushing at an open door! Because the establishment is now "woke". And they want to push the "woke" agenda.

But if you present against arbitrary government power being used to derail many or all the mobs, then the government doesn't like that. So it can use some coercion. But I can't remember the last time I was doing that. Are you going to make a video of it, or what?

Jimbo Yeah. We'll be basically going to be talking, you know, like the Covid section I will be sort of analysing that. It'll be long, will most likely be broken up, and just basically like linking it up as. And using sound bites[1] and other things like that, but some. And it will be documenting the protests.

And that's I will release the footage and stuff after the fact. And as I have people that are helping me, they're going to strangely last on it, and things like that by the comedy. Sometimes there'll be some laughs, but they're also very serious moments.

Pechsgeschi That doesn't surprise me that it doesn't surprise me!

Jimbo Yeah.

Pechsgeschi I mean, I...

Jimbo Yeah, no archive.

Pechsgeschi Don't you think this whole experience has been quite revealing? Not just of individuals. For example, I've about the only conservative commentator I'll watch is Tim Pool. I want to describe me as a conservative. I'm not sure you would. But I mean, almost all of the rest of them, I'm like, I can't stand to watch them. I can't stand to watch them. I can't stand to watch them, and just for America, when they found the election was stolen, I mean, you know, despite the copious evidence.

And even here the fact that a kind of bad file put has been turned into an excuse for insufficient denunciation of your character for [2] and [3] and [4].

Jimbo I was going to say, never let a good crisis go to waste. And like Tesla have unleashed. Have a good will of their, haven't they?

Pechsgeschi They haven't. I mean, all those people[5] ... You know, I used to, occasionally, over the years, describe myself as a Nazi, or as a communist. And I think, they're just a bunch of words. They're only in the if they're [6] and [7] [8] [9] [10] [11] [12] [13] [14] [15] [16] [17] [18] [19] [20] [21] [22] [23] [24] [25] [26] [27] [28] [29] [30] [31] [32] [33] [34] [35] [36] [37] [38] [39] [40] [41] [42] [43] [44] [45] [46]

I don't know what you're like for time. But I did prepare a short little speech that I would have liked to put on here. And if you'd allow me a couple of minutes.

Delingpole: Yes! Why not? You go for it Josh.

Josh: Excellent.

When you stop respecting your history and remembering your forebears, you cease to respect yourself. Remember that you have a debt of honor! If somebody died so that you could be free, or if somebody worked like a dog, or suffered like a slave, so that you could live in a civilized world, then you owe those men a debt of honor! You might never fully repay it, and neither with your children, but you could do nothing but good in trying!

And what could be more beautiful and noble than being the first wave of the movement, the first volunteers, that pave the way to victory?

So I say rebel! Rebel against being treated like robots, or chattel! Rebel against being just a number, or statistic! And rebel against starvation wages, the sale of our sovereignty, and the censorship of our protests! Your own personal rebellion is your duty and your right!

This country belongs to us, and nobody else! We're not going to give it away, not for free, and not for any price!

And what about you sat at home now? Have you come out and stood shoulder to shoulder with your brothers and sisters yet? Are you with us. And if not, why not? Don't deal with evil. Fight it everywhere you find it! They are monsters and they deserve it!

When you look at the statues and read the stories of the greatest men of our history who've made Britain so great, who did their part and more in her time of need, remember this: That you live in such a magnificent time where you are surrounded by enemies. So you cannot miss! All you have to do is strike out! It is our turn!

Britain is made up of great nations, great people, on great land! It has nothing to do with the state. We exist despite them not, because of them! Most men are living well below their energy, or potential. You have more to give. And there is more that you can achieve. So put more work into the movement!

Who is supposed to save Britain for you? No one is going to save Britain for you. If you are ever bored, you know, then that you are not in love.

A man in love will do anything! The subject of his love will occupy his mind in every unfilled moment. And he will constantly find new and creative ways to show this. Do you love Britain? Do you love your family? Do you love your people? Because I do!

Delingpole: That's fantastic! I so agree with you! Well done. Nice one.

Josh: Thank you.

Delingpole: That's really good. I'm glad you said that Josh. You struck a chord. Well, thank you for listening everyone. Do support Josh's Crowdfunder. And remember, if you like my podcast to support me on Patreon, or Subscribestar. Thank you very much. And yeah, keep fighting the fight Josh! Thanks a lot.

Josh: Thank you James! Thanks for having me. I appreciate it. Thanks everyone.

@Jody Kay I stopped watching/listening to mainstream media last March when I realised what was going down. I'm originally from the UK, but have been living in Cape Town with my wife and daughter for the past 10 years. When the South African President began parroting the same phrases as that buffoon Johnson, I knew something was wrong. This whole CONvid narrative has been built on lies. It doesn't take much research to see where this all stems from and once you've connected the dots (dropped the red pill) you cannot un-see what is going on. I'll never watch the legacy media, or trust another government so long as I draw breath.

Anyone remotely inspired by this should go just the extra mile to make themselves heard, and the love and light felt from that will be so palpable and perpetual that it couldn't possibly fail to spring them on to greater and better things, even if it's just more belief in themselves and their fellow brothers and sisters. Listening to Josh certainly gives one heart. A young chap who can still articulate what it means to be English at a time when the culture of England is under such an almost overwhelming threat of destruction. Simply putting on a mask, obeying the rules, and hoping that everything will somehow work out, in the end, is a fool's illusion. Tyranny can only be stopped by free-thinking men and women standing up and doing their duty to the country and for the good of all.

The earliest usage of the white dragon as a symbol of the Anglo-Saxons is found in the Historia Brittonum. The relevant story takes place at Dinas Emrys when Vortigern tries to build a castle there. Every night, unseen forces demolish the castle walls and foundations. Vortigern consults his advisers, who tell him to find a boy with no natural father, and to sacrifice him. Vortigern finds such a boy, but on hearing that he is to be put to death to solve the demolishing of the walls, the boy dismisses the knowledge of the advisors. The boy tells the king of the two dragons. Vortigern excavates the hill, freeing the dragons. They continue their fight and the red dragon finally defeats the white dragon. The boy tells Vortigern that the white dragon symbolises the Saxons and that the red dragon symbolises the people of Vortigern.

This guy reminds me a bit of the fitness YouTuber The Bioneer. It's good that he's a self-starter, especially if, as he says, it's easy to get used to the military running your life. That would explain why so many ex military become homeless. I was never good at creating opportunities, and now of course, that's not something that's meant to be on the table at all. For all its faults, Thatcherism seems like a heavenly ideology compared to the Conservative Party now. It's bizarre how many people fell for the ruse that they didn't want to lock down because they cared more about money than people (blah blah). I think I'm quite good at spotting these tricks, but it doesn't help me in day to day life because you might as well be talking Chinese as try to explain these things to most people.

I am all for building England back again. This could be done in every community, village, town. Currently our whole system in the west is corrupt including politics and the parliament. We should abide by law and live in a parallel way – within what is. Rekindle interest in the strength of English past with what we used to do – as Josh said – as simple as the local fetes and celebrations. Local business must be grown and supported. I would even go for an 'orthodox English church; (not happy clappy). Home schooling or a community school with traditional teaching. etc etc. I am not for the political movements – they are all corrupt and will be corrupted with our current system. Community run groups need to run and grow its strength……………………………just my thoughts!

@H They will put up independent candidates if the electoral commission will not approve them. Ultimately as Brexit showed, you don't need to win power to affect change, all you need to do is threaten the power of the mainstream parties enough to force them to change instead.
Our main goal over the next four years should be dissuading anyone from voting for the Tories.

Err, well, um, have to say, or add rather, to all the good stuff in this vlog, imo, but fractional reserve banking is what made the City the leading financial hub on the face of the planet. And crucially the City has never really had a genuinely serious financial disaster, unlike alas, America – whose 1st & 2nd Bank of the United States were abolished (early c.19th), and which was perhaps one of the key contributory factors to the Wall Street Crash 1929, and subsequent 08′ Crash (although things are no doubt more complex). I can talk at length about 1825 if interested.

Very interesting. Surely fractional reserve banking is a problem though, as banks can lend out 90% of deposited money and charge interest on it, this essentially allows the banks to create money out of thin air and profit from lending it out. To add to this, imagine if the money lenders themselves didn't have the best interests of the nation at heart, surely this wouldn't be a beneficial system to the population at large? I certainly don't consider myself left wing, but I do think modern banking poses a threat to our traditional nations!

Our culture is only Christian in a very loose sense. I wasn't brought up as a Christian so could never relate to it that much. I don't think atheistic materialism is correct either, so was in a bit of a no-man's-land, and like many others, found that Eastern philosophies made a lot of sense to me. Now, I see that Platonism is very similar, and that Christianity is very much grounded in Platonism. So, I think that if we want to take ourselves in a more spiritual direction, whilst being sincere, then re-exploring Western philosophy is the way to go.
I don't believe there was such a distinction between spirituality and philosophy in the ancient world, and I think that's the mindset we ought to get back to.

Well it makes sense to me, so naturally I disagree. Going by history, and also going by the endless debates I've heard, unless we rethink this all we'll just carry on with the same repetitive ping-pong match between empiricism and Christian dogma. You can ignore history i.e. the Renaissance, or the Reformation, or the Enlightenment, or 19th century Biblical criticism, but it'll just end up being repeated if you do, so it seems a bit pointless.

I think I do at least, broadly understand the significance of these movements. If I got anything wrong, it was putting the Renaissance before the reformation. In our case, they were roughly in sync. Anyway, I know you can be a Christian and be influenced by all these things, but the fact remains that the reformation started the questioning process that led things, but the fact remains that the reformation started the questioning process that led to the Empiricism and radical sceptism of Hume, and that pretty much logically implies the materialism and scientism of Dawkins. The Renaissance unearthed the esoteric and classical underpinnings of Christianity, and that was what prompted Giadorno Bruno to call for a return to the esoteric milieu from which Christianity emerged, arguing that it would unite Protestants and Catholics.

Nineteenth century Biblical criticism cast doubt on any claims that the myths and parables in the Bible were unique, and that in turn cast doubt on the idea that it was the uniquely authoritative word of God.
Yes, I know you can adapt orthodox Christianity to accommodate all of this, but it will be a strained effort, and I think that's why Christianity is dying out. If we don't like the meaninglessness and ennui of materialism, then I think we should follow Bruno's advice, which seems quite reasonable to me – especially in light of the fact that a lot of evidence is emerging that Christian dogma resulted from a calculated attempt to literalise more obviously abstract ideas.
For example, Philo of Alexandria, a Hellenised and aristocratic Jew, stated that Logos was the first born Son of God – I hardly think the correlation with Christian theology requires stating. His brother was the Aligarch of Alexandria, and he had two nephews, Tiberius Julius Alexander, and Marcus Julius Alexander. The former was a commander under Titus, son if Vespasian, and put down a Jewish revolt in Alexandria and also helped end the Jewish war of 66 – 70 AD which resulted in the destruction of the temple. His brother Marcus, meanwhile, married Princess Berenice, the daughter of Aggripa I, the king of Judea, and grandson of Herod the great.
As far as I'm concerned, all this makes the Christ Conspiracy theories of people such as James Valliant, Joe Atwill and Ralph Ellis look very persuasive. Basically, sophisticated spiritual and philosophical ideas were literalised (or at least, partially so) in order to quell the threat of militant Judaism.
I don't say those researchers are right in every respect, and where I'd most differ is that they seem to throw the baby out with the bathwater and assume that there's no kernel of truth to it all. That's kind of inevitable, I think, if we are to continue on with the completely unnecessary false dichotomy of Christian dogma Vs sceptism and dogmatic empiricism.

@Eman Puedama im not reading your monologue. Its way over the top and you're purposely subverting away from my original point that , England's culture is Christianity.
If you'd been listening to what Josh had actually said , you may of noticed him mention some important historical figures and episodes. Richard the lion heart and also , the battle of Agincourt.
king Richard was a ,crusader king who fought in the Holy land against Muslims in the name of Jesus christ. That makes king Richard the Lionheart a Christian.
The battle of Agincourt wasn't solely won thanks to the Longbow (like josh alludes to) it was won thanks to the driving ambition of a Christian thought process.
Don't you know about the speech king henry the 5th made to his soldiers on the day of battle, St crispian day ?
Which ever way you argue it , Christianity is woven through the history and heritage of the British people. Your generation, the generation thats now below the age of 37, won't understand this because you've grown up in a society thats purposely expunged Christianity from the institutions. You obviously know about the long march through the institutions, one of the things it did was to remove Christianity from society, it finally achieved this objective with Harriet Harmans 2010 equality act.
To state your not Christian is exactly what the big state want you to say !

I'm interested in this Christian thought process that you say won the battle of Agincourt. I'm not saying there's nothing in that, it would just be nice an outline of how that worked. One obvious potential problem with the idea is that the French were Christian too, but leave that aside if you want. It's obviously hard to tell when there's nothing much to go on, but I wonder how many people who say they're deeply Christian are trying to convince themselves. Anyway, it's annoying when I have looked into these things from a lot of angles, only to see my sincere conclusions, which are quite hard-won and have brought some comfort to me, stereotyped and strawmanned. Still, as I said in my last rambling monologue, I don't understand Middle Earth or Narnia, so it's possible that there's something about Christianity that appeals to the soul, but not to mine. The stereotyping and strawmanning is still irritating though, especially when you don't make any strong arguments, or really any arguments at all.

@Eman Puedama here we go again, rambling monologue no.3 now !
So many ridiculous points and you still havn't broached my original comment which started this whole thread.
Ok, I see you have skirted my factually correct point about Richard the Lionheart being Christian and you've tried to snag me on the fact that both the French and English army's, at Agincourt, believed in the same God. Well , so what if they did. They also both believed they could win the battle.
As it happened, God gave the day to the English.
Perhaps St crispian was so impressed with Henry's speech (which was rich in Christian reference) he told God to grant the English victory.
Maybe God wasn't very happy with the French for killing the ,Genoese mercenary crossbowmen after leaving the battlefield when they saw the battle was all but lost.
In any case, your admission that the French was also Christian ,suggests that you have begun to accept Christianity is infact ,woven into the very fabric of western culture. Which ties into my original statement, so thankyou.
Your subtle suggestion that those who think they are Christian have to shout the loudest because they are not really very Christian is a very poor smear attempt.
And finally , I'm not arguing with you dear boy, I'm debating. Utopians argue !

@Anita Maguire yes , i agree with you. The first school I attended from age 5 was a, Church or England school and was named ,St peters primary. It was heavily influenced with Christian teaching and tradition. We sang lovely hymns and prayed every morning. We celebrated many significant days throughout the calender year. Harvest festival, May day, Easter, Christmas, christingle. It did me a great service and to my mother , im eternally grateful for placing me at this school.
I also attended cubs and scouts which also leaned heavily on Christian culture. At both cubs and scouts , I actually swore in Gods name that I would do what is right.
They've since removed all reference to God to be more inclusive for those from different backgrounds !!!
Well that right there is sinister , multiculture doing is dastardly work.
Multiculture means , no specific culture. The rabid, utopian Marxists have taken away my Christian culture through subtle and little ways. Bit by bit and slowly over time.

I don't think it's that important that Richard the Lionheart was a staunch defender of the Christian faith. So was Vlad the Impaler for that matter, and from what I remember hearing somewhere, Richard the Lionheart was as culturally French as English. I doubt he could speak English, but perhaps you'll prove me wrong.
Anyway, it sounds as if I got more exposure to Christianity than most kids today even if few people took it seriously. I did wish at times that I'd had more of it to give me more of a sense of identity, and also something to rebel against, so there's grist to your mill.
On the whole though, I'm more philosophically inclined. There are four different yogas in Indian philosophy corresponding to preferences for devotion, work or 'path', thought, and I forget the other one.. perhaps ritual.
Anyway, I do think it's largely a matter of horses for courses. If I'd had more ritual and devotion perhaps I'd understand it more, but I could never be very sincere about it now, while I do at least have some understanding of metaphysics.
As I say, if I'd heard more about the Platonic aspect of Christianity, I might have been interested in that. If he existed, i think Jesus was a Jewish militant, and the story got inverted for propaganda purposes. However, i do find the idea that Jesus was the perfect expression of Logos, the same way that a drawn square is an imperfect expression of the form of a square, quite interesting. And I can the understand the idea that Logos both is God and is with God, in the way our idea that our thoughts are both with us and part of us – so, that's at least two parts of the trinity accounted for. I've read Catholic discussions about transubstantiation and Aristotle's substances as well, but I couldn't make any sense of it.
I think what it comes down to is that I can't accept the basic idea that Jesus paid for our sins with his death, and as long as we believe we are saved. It seems inherently paradoxical – like saying you can have a gift, but only if you're grateful. That would be paradoxical in itself because you're generally grateful after receiving a gift, but they compound the contradiction by claiming it's an unconditional gift, when it clearly isn't. The idea is intriguing enough to make me think there's something to it, but it also seems a bit forced.
Yes, I suppose it was a bit if a cheap shot to suggest you weren't sincere. I was more genuinely wondering than insinuating though. But anyway, I believe you are. One thing I expect I could agree with you on is that I dislike it when Muslims proselytise in the basis that this is a secular country. In my case, it's because I think Islam seems an annoyingly naive religion, and it was also born out of conflict and geopolitics.
I ought to close ramble number 4.. 5?.. there, but I wondered what you thought of the North European pagan elements that became incorporated into Christianity, do you think they're part of what makes this a culturally Christian country? I went to Rosslyn Chapel last autumn, and the Green Man carvings around the walls suggests to me that they would be.

I think that's largely true, but I also think that a lot of pre-Christian strands went into Christianity, and it's hard to seperate it all out. Also, I don't really like some cultural Christianity because bit seems quite token to me even if deeply felt. I heard that Richard Dawkins likes evensong or something like that, but as he's a materialist I don't see anything interesting about that. Of course, I know our thoughts and attitudes aren't always exactly consistent, so it's possible some of his are shaped by Christian metaphysics. I don't find that kind of inconsistency very interesting either though.
I guess I'm a bit partisan in all this because, when talking about Big Questions, I like something to have something philosophical to get my teeth into and I've met a smug Christian who was as good as a materialist in his Scientism (even tho he contradicted himself) and claimed that Christianity was held back by philosophy – which I knew was absurd even then.
My brother has married a Christian, and when I tried to discuss intelligent design with her, she just laughed and said that there are some things we're not supposed to know. All in all, Christians don't seem to be very philosophical – at least not in this country.
American Christians seem to be more so, and I hate to say it, but so do Muslims. Perhaps it's not necessary for Christianity to be philosophical, I can see that argument. It's just not interesting to me otherwise, and in the case if the first guy I mentioned, it seems much more pretentious to claim to be an intellectual Christian whilst poo-pooing metaphysics.

@Eman Puedama By the way you are correct Richard did not speak English. His succeeding brother, John of Magna Carta, was the first Norman king to speak English. I think you have been influenced by the opinions of a few Christians, rather than reading a good Bible translation (the twentieth century ones are watered down) because the actual Bible is full of philosophical questions.
Today many Christians conflate their faith with being "nice. "
They overemphasize, love their neighbor, whilst ignoring that Jesus did not come in peace he came with a sword.

Well I haven't read the Bible very thoroughly, but I'm familiar with a lot of its content and I know you could say that various parts such as The Book Of Job and various of Jesus' parables "Consider the lilies of the field… " etc. are quite philosophical. At the moment, I'd be most interested in the Gospel of John – "In the beginning was the Logos, and the Logos was with God, and the Logos was God", because I think that's got to be one of the most obviously metaphysical and Platonic bits, and a clue to what the doctrine of the trinity is about.
Yes, I know he said "I come with a sword" and asked one of his disciples if they were armed and said "good". He also threw the moneylenders out of the temple of course. But then, he hung around with tax-collecters too, and said "Render unto Caesar that which is Caesar's". His statement that his kingdom is "not of this world" doesn't seem to fit with his more militant statements that suggested he was the kind of military Messiah a lot of Jews must have hoped for.
I know explanations have been offered for these apparent contradictions, but I think the most obvious explanation is that the Romans, along with their aristocrat Jewish allies such as Josephus, King Agrippa I, and the two brothers, Marcus and Tiberius Julius Alexander, flipped the idea of a militant Messiah on its head in order to defuse the threat of Jewish nationalism. They left contradictory elements in there because that added to the confusion and aided the PsyOp.
What's interesting to me is that the esoteric spin they put on the Jesus story seems to owe a lot to the ideas of the Alexander brothers' uncle, Philo of Alexandria, whose Jewish/Greek syncretism was sincere, and would not have approved. I agree that a lot of Christians, but not all, have a very woolly idea of their religion.

Patriotic Alternative won't achieve anything they merely have 12 thousand supporters. That's not enough to make any dent in UK politics. Also, optics lord, Collett is not a good leader. Plus they seem to have a big nonce problem within the membership.
